

Scenarios

#1 – It is now Wednesday and it has been raining for 3 days straight (Monday, Tuesday, & today). Tomorrow the forecast calls for sunny skies all the way through Sunday. You know the boss is going to call tonight and you will have to report to work as usual in the morning and since you have not mowed any yards all week you will be working long hours for the next several days. In fact, you will most likely be working from morning till dark all the way through the weekend (Sunday included); it is company policy to get all yards mowed if we can. You know that when you signed on for this job you had the possibility of working on the weekends, and you did get 3 days off this week, but the guys are going to the lake this weekend to go fishing and I'd sure like to go! What do I do?

#2 – You are mowing a client's yard that you are really familiar with and kind of daydreaming as you mow. As you are outlining the yard you accidentally hit the fence breaking one of the pickets. The picket is still attached, but it is definitely cracked all the way through and will eventually need repaired. However, the homeowner may not notice it for a long time and no one saw you do it. What do you do?

3# - You have been working for our company for about five months now and things are going great! You have settled in nicely, you've learned your job well, everyone likes you, and you seem to be on the fast track. You and your co-workers are really getting along and you have made many friends. One day a co-worker confides in you that they have been smoking marijuana before work and sometimes on the jobsites. He laughs about it and asks you not to say anything; says he can't do his job without it and it helps him work better. What do you do?